

Course Prefix/Number/Title: WS: 110 Introduction to Womens Studies

Number of Credits: 3

Course Description: An interdisciplinary introduction to the processes by which gender is socially constructed, in relation to sex and sexuality. This course will provide the tools to analyze the complex intersections of gender with other categories like race, ability, class, and religion and understand how they affect the circulation of power. Students will reflect on their identity and experiences, and how these concepts shape our lives and our world. This class will engage with pressing social issues and influential cultural representations, norms, practices, and institutions.

Pre-/Co-requisites: N/A

Course Objectives: This course is designed to help students develop a working understanding of the variety of ways that gendered interactions influence any given society. By the end of the semester students should have working critical thinking skills that can address and identify how socio-political factors influence the interpersonal relationships between men and women as well as the institutions and structures which govern modern society.
